

Bed Thirteen

Written by PAG

Tuesday, 30 September 2014 22:10

(The cardiac recovery ward was short-staffed, struggling along with half its normal staffing , so Sister said. Contemplating the ceiling and infinity. I wasn't inclined to poetry at the time but the good old subconscious filed away an idea...)

Hello, you Bed Thirteen?
Sister said I should come and talk to you as I've nothing better to do. I'm on work experience. you know.Maybe
I might be a nurse one day.
Excuse me. You're rather faint?
You're 'not feeling very well?'
I see, of course, wouldn't be, would you? That's why you're here.
If you don't mind me saying so, you look a little queer.
And Bed Thirteen, well, I mean – Twelve A would sound lots better, don't you think? If I was In Bed Thirteen, heaven know,
I'd be turning up my toes.
But don't let me worry you.
You're 'going to die?' Not now, wait till a real nurse is here.
'Where are they?' At lunch, I guess, left this place a right old mess.
'Who's in charge?' Me, I suppose.
You do look funny! Gobsmacked.
With your jaw dropped open, and your eyes rolled right up like that.
Anyway, if you haven't died, you haven't lived, they say: the best night's sleep you've had in years...
(that's a joke...) Well, please yourself.
I must go. All the best. If I were you, I'd get some rest.

Jeff Garland